@SamSim

I can only partly agree with your post in which you claim that all teenagers are in front of their screens all day long. I am a teenager and I don't use my phone 24 hours a day, 7 days a week and neither do my friends. As it seems to me, we use our mobile phones and tablets in appropriate ways at the right time and at the right places and our aim is definitely not to hide behind them because of our shyness.

On the other hand, I can fully understand older adults and their dissatisfaction with the younger generation (my parents have the same opinion as you 😊). But I disagree that using mobile technologies for a long time means we want to escape from reality. There are some reasons why we are “glued to the screen” as you said.

First of all, our generation (born in the 2000s) grew up already surrounded by computers and telephones – we watched the devices developing, getting more options, becoming easier to use. Adults who didn't have any phones in their childhood and got used to living without them can't understand the importance of mobile technologies in our modern world.

To my mind, phones are meant as sources of communication; that's why there's nothing bad in being able to keep in touch with friends and relatives. The next reason is a big variety of options on our devices that are helpful in lots of ways in our life, e.g. for studying, looking up timetables of public transport, searching for unknown words, listening to music.

But even though we can't imagine our life without phones anymore, it's important to stay in real life. We all know these parties when everybody is on the phone, right guys? 😊 In my point of view, it's also impolite to use phones while speaking with somebody or during lessons (even if nobody notices it.) Furthermore, while attending meetings or using some public places (the library for instance), you should better turn the sound off.

Do you guys have any other ideas how to use your smartphone appropriately? Also, I think Samantha could need some more assurances from us youngsters that we are not lost behind our screens all the time. What do you think?
